2 Tight End Sets can create some problems. The 4-3 Defense is an unbalanced front, compared to 8-man fronts like the 3-3-5 Defense and 4-2-5 Defense. Forcing it to balance up is a good strategy for Offensive Coordinators. The Over Front can adjust to 2 TE sets. But the Under Front may be your best bet.

Defending 2 Tight End Formations in the Under Front

One of the biggest advantages of the 4-3 defense is its ability to adapt to any offensive attack. Whether you face a Pro-I, Spread, or Flex Bone you can adjust your base front without breaking your basic rules. In this video, we are looking at aligning your 4-3 Defense to stop Double Tight End formations.

Aligning the 4-3 Defense against 2 Tight End Formations

This offense consists of 5 linemen, 2 tight-ends, 2 wing-backs, and a full back. This offense is difficult to stop, and will execute well at the youth football level. The Double Wing is all about getting blockers to the point of attack. This offense will pull the backside guard and tackle nearly every play.

The offense has a good angle to use the TE to block the SS from folding into the box. That leaves the FS. The FS can make the tackle but not without issues. The RB vs. FS may be a bad match up. The FS may have to make an open field tackle vs. a full speed RB. Requiring the FS to be hyper aggressive to fit the run also opens up play action risks.

For example, against a full-house (fullback and two halfbacks in the backfield), double-tight-end T formation, a 10-1 would be too strong out wide and not strong enough in the middle, where the offensive strength is concentrated.

The Gap-8 and 10-1 football defenses - John T. Reed

It would only be a true gap-8 if the offense lined up as they did in the old days when the gap-8 got its name, against a double-tight-end, full-house-T, wishbone, wing-T, or power-I formation. It is very hard to justify any other youth defense. Youth football is generally a running game.
